A WOMAN'S HEART

JOHN GANT drew himself behind a pillar of the veranda and pulled his slouch hat farther over his eyes, as he felt the gaze of the little country inn, rest curiously upon his disfigured face. He had not yet become accustomed to being stared at.

The fresh spring morning had no charm for him for he felt that his life was ruined. He looked over at the tiny vine-trilled cottage, with a bitter sigh and a rebellious spirit. He had come from the hospital to his old home, and for a whole week had been so near to Rose, his sweetheart, that twenty steps would have carried him to her side; and yet he had kept his room until the morning of his departure, fearing, by chance to meet her.

He had sent coldly polite notes of thanks for the many gifts of flowers and books which had come to him from her kind hands; and though his heart cried out in bitter protest, he resolved that he would never see her again. He would rather die than see her shrink from him in disgust.

Moodily, he smoked his cigar, and reviewed the past—the long years of toil and study in college, his admission to the bar, his first speech before a jury—a speech that had won the plaudits and bright predictions of his colleagues. How full of promise life had seemed! But everything bright had come to an end on the day of the accident.

The explosion of a gun in his own hands had robbed his right eye of its sight, and torn his cheek so frightfully that he started in horror when he first saw its reflection in the mirror. The publicity of the court would be intolerable to him now. He must work at something away from the eyes of men.

Suddenly, a sweet young voice rang out in a merry song, behind the tall thorn hedge, and in an instant the man was on his feet.

It was Rose. The desire to see her once more overpowered him. His cigar and resolution were alike forgotten. He ran down the steps, and sprang through a gap into a little flower garden, where a slender, brown-haired girl, on her knees, was searching among the wet leaves for violets.

"Good morning, John," she said, quietly. "See! I have quite a nice little bunch. Papa had his yesterday morning; these are for you. Kneel down here while I pin them on."

And the young fellow knelt at her side, and shut his teeth tightly together, while with dew-wet fingers she pinned the fragrant cluster on his coat.

How sweet she was! How dangerously kind and oblivious! He must not stay; he could not trust himself any longer.

They both rose, she blushing a little at her nonsense.

"I have come to bid you good-by, Rose," he said, almost curtly. "I have sufficiently recovered. I think, to go back to work, and I leave for the city within an hour. Rose, I want you to know how deeply grateful I am for your many acts of kindness. I have seemed cold and unappreciative, but I have not been indifferent. Heaven knows I have not! I shrink so from meeting you. But I believe you will understand it all."

The girl looked at him with an aching heart. Yes, she understood. Oh, the pity of it all! That stalwart figure, so suggestive of power and strength; that noble heart, cherishing only kindness for every living creature; that bright mind, sharpened and cultivated by closest study; that indomitable will, which had overcome all sorts of obstacles and won success at last; all these attributes of a grand character to be shadowed by an external flaw.

She looked at the red, scarred face, and could have cried aloud in her anguish for him.

"Rose," he continued, "I had something I intended to tell you soon, but it will never be told now. God bless you, little friend; the thought of you will always be my sweetest pleasure and safeguard."

He wrung her hand in farewell and turned to go.

there, I have worshiped the ground you walk on. I meant to have asked you to be my wife; but now—"

"I know what you would say, John. Listen. Almost since I can remember, you have been my champion, my adviser, my hero. I revere your strong, pure nature. I have watched with pride your success in the busy world. I shall feel honored, John, to become the wife of so good and true a man."

"Rose!" ejaculated the young fellow, seizing her hands, and looking at her in mingled doubt and delight; "you do not mean it, dear. You do not comprehend what you are saying."

"It is you who fail to comprehend, John. God looks at the heart, not the outward appearance, and a good woman's love is skin to God. I learned long ago to love the sweet, unselfish soul within you. And do you suppose that this 'blemish' of the face will change one iota of that affection?"

"Oh, John, how little you understand a woman's heart! Wait!" she cried, as he attempted to draw her into his arms.

"I am going to say something that will hurt you. You were a very handsome man, and you were very vain. Do you know that personal vanity is one of the weakest of weak things in a man? I deplored it in you, for it was the one flaw in your character."

"Forgive me, John. Your beauty of face is gone forever, but your beauty of character is untouched, and may be enhanced if you will but bear your affliction in a manly, patient spirit. Where is your faith, John? You taught me long ago to trust in God's wisdom and goodness. Do you not see that he is dealing with you in love, and that all these things will work together for your good?"

"Rose, my love, my little comfort!" cried the man, in broken tones.

"Yes, I see, I see! God is good. He has given me youth and health, and your best love. I will never doubt Him again. Oh, Rose, the scales have fallen from my eyes, and my duty seems clear. How weak I have been! I will not give up my beloved profession, but will rise superior to this morbid sensitiveness, which is but a species of the vanity you have spoken of, and with God's help I will yet make an honored name for us both."

"Oh, Rose!" he cried, stretching out his hands to her in pathetic tenderness; "do you know what you have done? You have given me back faith and hope, and life is once more worth the living. What may I say yet accomplish with you at my side? Never, until now, did I thoroughly understand the wealth of affection that abides in a true woman's heart."

Devoted Mother.

A correspondent sends to The Auk a pleasing story of motherly devotion on the part of a least flycatcher. This bird, one of the smaller members of the numerous flycatcher family, is common in apple orchards, and from its cry is sometimes known as Chebec.

A least flycatcher built its nest in a half-dead apple-tree in our dooryard. When the young ones were only a few days old there came a very hot day, and having no leaves to shelter them, they suffered greatly from the heat, so that their heads hung over the rim of the nest.

The mother took a position just above them, and with outstretched wings did her best to shield them from the sun. For more than two hours she kept her place, not leaving it even to bring them food.

When we noticed that she, too, was panting with the heat we thought it time to go to her rescue. With a rake we hoisted a grain bag over the nest to serve as an awning.

The male bird appeared at once, and the mother, finding the nest shaded, joined him in catching insects for the little ones, who quickly revived.

Loved Twenty-Five Years.

For twenty-five years Mrs. Louise J. Tilly, of Atlanta, loved her husband through thick and thin. Though she was wealthy when he married her, she worked in the field like a common laborer, and when he went to keeping hotel she was clerk, cook, chambermaid and laundress. It was not, as she affirms, till he had got nearly all
